For City Clerk—Miss Saidee Van Brower, R. H. Duriee.

"The Yellow Jacket"

THE YELLOW JACKET," the pseude-Chinese play, by George C. Hazelton and J. Harry Benrimo, which will be the opening production of the Forest Theatre's summer seaseason, has been played all over the world, has been translated into twenty-six languages, and is regarded generally as a distinct contribution to the modern movement in the theatre. Perhaps the best summing up of its possibilites as an imaginative drama, of its simplicity and child-like make-believe, is the critical article by Clayton Hamilton, the New York critic. The following is from his review.

"The recent production of the 'Yellow Jacket' must be regarded as the most educative offering which has been presented in New York for several seasons. No interested student of the stage can afford to ignore it. But the merits of this remarkable play are not merely educational; for, apart from its historical significance, it is an asthetic composition of rare and subtle beauty.

"The 'Yellow Jacket' is an imaginary Chinese play, presented in accordance with the conventions of the Chinese theatre. The scene represents the old Jackson Street Theatre in San Francisco, and upon this stage a typical Chinese story is enacted in the Chinese manner.

"The conventions of the Chinese stage are curiously similar to those of the Elizibethan drama; and the story of the 'Yellow Jacket' is therefore unfolded in accordance with a narrative method that is almost identical with Shakespeare's. As in the Globe Theatre on the Bankside, the stage is a platform devoid of scenery, but decorated by furniture and properties that are shifted, from dialogue to dialogue, to accommodate the exigencies of the action. Again, as at the Globe, there is a door at either side of the rear of the stage—one for entrance and one for exits. Between these two doors there is an alcove, or recess, which was used by Shakespeare as part of the imagined scene, but is employed in the Chinese theatre to house the orchestra that accompanies the dialogue with incidental music. Over this alcove there is, in both theatres, a balcony, or upper stage, which may be used at any moment in the presentation of the story. The scene is imagined to be wherever the actors say that it is, and the place of the action may be shifted by the simple expedient of emptying the stage through the rear door and bringing on new actors through the entrance door. There is a chorus as in Shakespeare's Henry V, to ask the audience to imagine the locality of the scene about to be presented; and, from dialogue to dialogue, the furniture is shifted by a property-man, who is dressed in black and is supposed to be invisible.

"These Chinese conventions, which are identical at nearly every point with those of Shakespeare, are only in a small degree less natural than those of our American stage today; but because our public is not used to them, they seem to us ridiculous. Of this necessary reaction of the Occidental audience the authors of "The Yellow Jacket" have carefully made capital. They have invited the American public to laugh at the conventions of the Chinese theatre and have thereby enriched their play with comedy. But, by doing this, they have also accomplished a more difficult achievement. They seem to have reasoned that their audience, by the mere exercise of laughing their fill at these outlandish artifices, would become so accustomed to them that in time these very conventions would cease to seem ridiculous and might securely be employed for the suggestion of lofty poetry and poignant pathos. This subtle triumph has been successfully achieved.

"It would be superfluous to summarize the story of this play, so no enumeration of its ever-fluctuating flow of incidents could suggest the whimsical and subtle art with which the story is unfolded. The black-robed property-man (who is supposed to be invisible) piles a few chairs together in the middle of the stage, smoking all the while a careless cigarette and looking ludicrously bored at the performance. A young man and a young woman climb upon the chairs, and tell you that they are reclining upon a flower boat that is drifting slowly down a river. Two attendants (imagined to be boatmen) stand behind the chairs and pole rhythmically at the unresisting air with slender bamboo rods (imagined to be oars), while a musician (in full view of the audience) scrapes two pieces of sand paper together to imitate the swish of water along the bilge of a boat; and lo, in spite of or perhaps because of, the crudity of these conventions, the auditor finds himself really and truly (because imaginatively) drifting in a boat, banked with flowers and lyrical with song and redolent of youth and love. To achieve such an eloquent effort as this by means so primitive and childish is a scarcely precedented triumph of theatric art.

The story drifts through many moods, satiric, tragic, lyric, pathetic; and all these moods are rendered easily through the media of utterance at which the audience has laughed heartily only a moment before. The lines are beautifully written, and the action appeals so poignantly to the imagination that we realize a life giving vision, of which no literal transcription is presented on the stage.

For President
HIRAM W. JOHNSON

Where She Stands

Carmel, Cal., March 30

W. L. Overstreet,
Weekly Pine Cone,
Dear Sir:

My idea of a successful, satisfactory town government is the very simple one of majority rule. That is, I believe that the governing board which comes nearest carring out the wishes of the greater number of the people best fulfills the function for which it was created.

Public business is not different from private business: in both good results are only to be had by harmony of aim and action. Any proposition favored by a majority of the people in a town can make itself heard. The board is never in doubt as to what the town wants; details of how it may be secured are the work of the board, and difficulties in that have to be met as they come up.

Carmel has little money and large needs; the finances are strained to cover the must-haves. The running expenses must be met, we want such protection as the town gives, and beyond that is the question of streets.

Under the present arrangement the lot owners are bearing the initial expense of these; but only the town itself can attend to their upkeep. Not to do so would be like buying a pair of socks, wearing them till they were filthy holes and then cursing them for not lasting satisfactorily forever.

With me the idea of streets, as good as we can get now, and then street repair, road mending, the patching of the worst places where we have no streets, has become a creed, really a sort of civic religion. There may be a very small amount to spend on this, but that is the more reason that it should be judiciously expended and carefully looked after.
